Summary:

Currently, solar thermal systems represent the most widespread type of alternative energy in Europe. They derive their importance from using different kinds of heating systems which do not use fossil fuels and therefore do not cause pollution.

In reality the replacement of conventional space heating and water heating systems has been a slow process. However, over the past 30 years, overall sales of solar thermal systems have been continuously increasing although it remains a niche market.

The total park installed is now estimated to have reached more than 15 sqm. Volume sales for 2004 show Germany as market leader followed by Austria and Greece.

Research for these reports has drawn mainly on face-to-face and telephone interviews with manufacturers, importers and distributors, plus a variety of published sources: government statistics, trade associations, in-house and library data.
